President's Message

2014 is off with a BANG!

Being from the Tampa Bay area, chances are you have heard of, or maybe even speak, Spanglish. What about Sport-ugese? In the spirit of the Olympics, and just for fun, here's a light-hearted look at a common, though frequently unrecognized, language phenomenon.

Whether or not you're a sports fan, chances are you speak a little Sportugese. That is, you use sports analogies without even realizing it!

Oh, come on. You do and you know it. Let's take the gloves off. Uh, well, okay, I guess that's two strikes. Yikes! Can I get a mulligan here?

My point made, let's look at some of the more popular forms of Sport-ugese. One of my personal favorites is the saying, "batting a thousand." I use this and have absolutely no idea what it means. Nor do I care, as I believe I'm using it correctly, and, besides, if I'm using it incorrectly and the listener doesn't correct me, then I feel the joke is really on them.

Another one of my favorites is the "Hail Mary" anything. Let's be fair though. This is actually a double header (get it?). The Hail Mary is borrowed from Christianity, applied to sports and then re-applied to whatever the Sport-ugese speaker supposes it applies to. Let's try an example for clarity. Okay, say the speaker of Sport-ugese is driving and pulled over for exceeding the speed limit by a tiny bit. She cannot afford another citation so she looks left, fakes right, and is ready when the law enforcement officer approaches the driver's side window. She takes a deep breath and immediately opens with, "Do you have any donation forms for the Police Benevolent Fund? I have my contribution check ready." The Hail Mary in action.

Do you have game? Aha. See, you knew just what I meant by that. Are you a benchwarmer, pinch hitter, or heavy hitter? These terms are frequently used in dialect known as workplace Sport-ugese.

Let me end with the SCORE! Ladies, this one needs very little explanation. You can score things, like choice seats to a game or the last free gift-with-purchase at the Estee Lauder counter. You can also score proverbial points, like when you compliment your mother-in-law's new hairstyle.

So remember, be a team player, swing for the fences and win one for the Gipper in the "game" of life. Thanks to the entire NEW Team for all you do, especially during the EWOTY season.
